Leadership: Creating Public Value — A Harvard Experience Worth Sharing

Over the past eight weeks, I had the privilege of completing Leadership: Creating Public Value, an exceptional course from Harvard University that challenges public servants to think deeply and act decisively.

This wasn't just another leadership course.

It was a masterclass in aligning purpose, strategy, and action—using the Strategic Triangle to identify public value, build political legitimacy, and marshal operational capacity. Whether you're solving a complex community problem, building coalitions across silos, or driving systems-level change, the framework is both rigorous and actionable.

Through compelling cases—from Boston to the Netherlands—we confronted real-world dilemmas, grappled with tough trade-offs, and reimaged what public leadership can look like when anchored in values, equity, and results.

As someone working at the intersection of technology and public service, this course gave me a powerful lens to reframe cybersecurity not just as a technical necessity, but as a public value—one that protects citizen trust, ensures service continuity, and reinforces democratic legitimacy.

 If you're a public servant, policymaker, nonprofit leader, or change agent looking to lead with impact, I can't recommend this course enough. It's a game-changer for anyone serious about improving lives through public work.
